The film at the centre of the exhibition is one of a series of evocative video and sound installations by the artist which explore the experience of memory and the formation of identity in situations of social tension and trauma.

A vivid portrait of this remarkable location, situated at the furthest edge of Britain, Balnakiel portrays this extraordinary setting, continually exposed to, and under siege from, a hostile and threatening environment, in which the extremes and vicissitudes of weather are echoed by the intermittent thunder of RAF and Royal Navy manoeuvres around this still-active bombing range.

As well as a study of this brooding, melancholy landscape, the work focuses on the lives and recollections of contemporary residents of Balnakiel and the nearby, older village of Durness, highlighting a split between the original inhabitants of several generations standing and a newer influx of arrivals from four decades ago.

Within this patchwork of overlapping impressions and stories, Balnakiel considers underlying complexities in the interaction between individual and collective memory.

Informed by a series of exchanges with cognitive psychologist Martin A. Conway, the work draws attention to the strategies the human memory employs to attempt to either articulate or suppress strong undercurrents of experience when a sense of self and community identity is under threat.

The complex structure and layered narratives within the film reflect Conway and Illingworth’s explorations into the behaviour of the memory in the face of trauma.
The community at Balnakiel by virtue of its isolation is in some respects isomorphic to an individual’s human memory. Memory is in itself isolated to one individual’s mind where it is experienced and felt. This rather abstract parallel provides a particularly potent link between an individual mind and an individual community.”

The exhibition also features a collection of photographs of the Balnakiel community and its surrounding landscapes. Illingworth’s photography, intimate in scale and evocative of early forms of photographic records, celebrates the resilience of these isolated communities, whilst noting the slow and progressive depopulation that haunts this landscape.

Professor Martin A Conway

is a cognitive neuropsychologist and one of the foremost international experts in the field of Autobiographical Memory. His work explores the centrality of memory to our sense of self. He became Chair of the Research Board of the British Psychological Society in 2006, and holds a prestigious ESRC (Economic and Social Research Council) Professorial Fellowship at Leeds University. Conway has written several publications on human memory and regularly publishes in international journals. As part of BBC Radio Four’s Memory Survey 2006 (www.bbc.co.uk/radio4/memory), Conway and the Leeds Memory Group helped gather over 12,000 personal memories collected from throughout the UK, constituting the largest archive of memories to date.

Balnakiel is an exhibition of new work by Shona Illingworth and features a major new film commission alongside a collection of drawings and photographs.

Presenting a complex investigation of memory, history and spirit-of-place, this body of work is centred on the village (and former radar base) of Balnakiel in the far North West of Scotland, where the artist grew up.

Balnakiel gives voice to contrasting perceptions and constructions of the past, and the way in which they continue to resonate in a place whose geographical remoteness belies its position at the forefront of considerable social and cultural change.
